

Prohibition on giving legal or medical advice

When you express an opinion on a legal or medical subject, this can be perceived as legal or medical advice, which is prohibited, unless you are a doctor or lawyer.

Teachers may under no circumstances give legal or medical advice to students. They may, however, specify what is not allowed for non-health professionals (for example: not attempting to treat a traumatic shock, not making a diagnosis, not resorting to regression into lived past events, etc.).

The teacher must inform students that they cannot provide legal or medical advice and must direct students toward the appropriate professionals (e.g.: lawyer, doctor, psychologist or other).

The information given to students must remain general or be based on personal experience, without aiming to resolve a specific situation.

Examples

Student's question: how to treat cancer by hypnosis?

The teacher mentions the importance of maintaining medical treatments and support psychological, and points out that they are not in a the right to give legal or medical advice

Student question: can I treat a trauma in regression hypnotic?

The teacher specifies that any form of hypnotic regression intended to treat a trauma must be carried out by a professional, and that only these professionals hold that authorization.

The teacher encourages the student to consult a reference site for professionals, such as the Ordre des psychologues.

The teacher presents the Méthode Dolfino techniques that improve well-being physical and psychological, as well as the management of emotions. These personal development tools support the process of healing without replacing medical treatments medical or psychological.
